Project description

Llewelyn Davies designed the major expansion of 4 universities in the eastern region of Libya to full tender information, prior to the project being suspended due to the civil war.

Working with educational programmers, the design team worked closely with each university to create individually distinct identities for each university, whilst maintaining a modular and flexible approach to the planning of each building. The site planning allowed for maximum flexibility and expansion of faculties, given the uncertainty of each university's predicted student intake and curricula.

The buildings and the public realm were carefully designed to ensure the maximum cross flow of air and natural ventilation, employing traditional techniques for solar shading between buildings and in the external facades.
